Description
Looking at the roadmap today, I noticed the count off. I see only two open issues, and it lists three. I also clicked on the http://www.redmine.org/projects/redmine/issues?fixed_version_id=74&amp;#38;set_filter=1&amp;#38;status_id=0 link and it shows only two that way also. I'm assuming it's taking into account issues that are considered private and listing them in the count, but not displaying them. CountOff.png

I'm assuming it's taking into account issues that are considered private and listing them in the count, but not displaying them.

Indeed. This duplicates issue #15248; closing as such...

Since I can't see the private issue, I should not be informed there are issues that are private. I suggest it's a defect in that the count should not display issues I can not see.

- Status changed from Reopened to Closed

I'd argue that the even for anonymous viewers, the total count should be visible, since the goal is to give the viewer an idea of how many issues are to be solved. The topics / content of the issues may be private and, as such, hidden from viewers, but they should nevertheless know they are there.

Otherwise, if the count would not contain private issues, users would ask "Why isn't version x.y released, all issues in the roadmap are closed?"...
