Description
It would be great to wrap search panel HTML element (the form) to extra div since form itself is hardly styled in cross-browser manner.
It would allow to set border, some kind of decorations ...e tc, which is (by my opinion) useful to better orientation on the screen. I have attached how it may look on the screen (the red color of the border is sample only to make it really contrast) and in the resulting HTML code.

I'd prefer to add a div inside the form that wraps the content and buttons (eg. `<form>...</form>`). Please, let me know if you have any problem with that.

From my perspective it is better to WRAP it since it is more flexible (as I know - especially in older IEs - there were issues with styling things directly inside form), but my goal is to style ENTIRE search and option panel different way then default, so it this goal is achieved it is OK. I am not so experienced in HTML styling...

The problem is that I'd like to add the same kind of div to the query form on the time entries list. And this form needs to wrap not only the filters and options but the tabs that are below and a few more fields.

I've made a few tests with my firefox and styling a div that wraps the form or the whole content of the form does not make any difference, so I'll go with this option.

div#query_form_with_buttons added in r12645 to issues and time entries filters.
