

Redmine - Patch #15906

Create a default forum by default

Description
In my experience, new or inexperienced users find it hard to get started with the forums. This is because of the fact that it doesn't suffice to enable the module, one has to also create a first forum in the project settings. I therefore propose this patch which adds an empty "general" forum when the module is activated. It uses the same mechanism that creates the project's wiki. This way, users will see the "Forums" tab in their project immediately after they enabled the module.

+1 for this feature. Or, add a 'Create forum' link on the forum page.

+1 for this, improved patch attached with some tests. I'm not sure we should include a new locale key though, locale maintenance is just a pain. Let me know what you think.

Thanks for adding tests to my patch. I agree that managing locales is a pain, but I don't see a better way than to have a (english) text like "General" or something which would be fine for French/English/German I think, but certainly not for other languages. Do you have a better idea to avoid the locale key?

Please let's develop Redmine in a way that doesn't undermine its internationalization, specially for non-Latin locales. It seems Redmine has got many users in non-Latin locales, e.g. Japanese.

@Jan: I was thinking about giving a shorter description with the same key, but it feels weird / not polished. :(

@Ebrahim: obviously we all love the fact that Redmine has many available translations ; here we can either add a new locale key that may not be translated in much languages now, or not add it and rely on a poorer version with existing keys ; what's your opinion ?

Ah! I think I tried that, too, but could not find one...

What do you think about introducing a new key, but defaulting its value to value of an already existing key (say label_general) for every existing locale?

Update: By the way there is no problem with using label_general key for Persian locale.
