Isn't that a (missing) feature of a specific theme?

Easy and clean solution would be to create a new custom theme which imports from the redmine default theme and then just overwrites / extends what should be changed? e.g.

```
#footer { display: none;}

If this simple solution is unwelcome, there are still commercial themes for redmine which support some customizing from the redmine admin.

The content of the footer is not part of a theme, therefore it cannot be changed. Perhaps the best solution would be to move the footer into a separate partial view which can be overridden by a plugin.

It was supported by using the view customization plugin and setting the CSS.

Please refer to the link below for the contents.

<https://redmine.tokyo/issues/1304#note-10>

Since it is CSS, there is a restriction that it is not displayed at the time of printing and it is not possible to attach a URL link.

This method requires the view customize plugin.
