Description
It happens quite often at Planio that we have to support users who accidentally deleted something. Often, a Javascript alert box is simply dismissed by the user without actually grasping it's message, leading to unintended consequences. Especially in the case of deleted user accounts, a lot of information is lost and hard to restore from a backup. The first patch in this issue introduces an explicit confirmation page (similar to when deleting a project) which requires to enter the login of the user to be deleted in order to confirm the deletion. It also suggests locking the user as a safer option instead and offers a button to do so. The second patch changes the project deletion page to require the user to enter the identifier of the project to be deleted, instead of just ticking a checkbox, just to make it a bit harder to delete the wrong project by accident.

- Subject changed from require explicit confirmation when deleting a user to Require explicit confirmation when deleting a user or a project
- Target version set to Candidate for next major release

Very nice addition and it works well from my tests.

I've added the patches to CI, if all the tests pass, I think we can deliver this in version:"4.2.0" and use this implementation to improve other object deletion (like #33071).

- Target version changed from Candidate for next major release to 4.2.0

Tests pass <https://gitlab.com/redmine-org/redmine/-/pipelines/227153244> (except system tests, but there are other issues there).

#5 - 2020-12-09 15:27 - Go MAEDA

It is a great improvement. I think there is no reason not to deliver this new feature in Redmine 4.2.0.
